

Abstract

A family is the first environment where children begin their development and it's also a place where they can find a safe haven filled with love and care. All parents have a crucial role to form children's identity and their emotional strength. In that matter, parents need to nurture them wisely. Some parents don't recognize their way of parenting and its relevance to the future. Authoritarian parenting is known as the right way to educate children so that they have a successful life. Through making the hard rules and punishment, children are led to be submissive. Therefore, children have good qualities at school and workplace. But what if it's not truly the right way? In what scale do parents supposed to implement their authority in their children? Is keeping them away from their freedom always make a way to the success? Does it affect their psychological and emotional aspects as an individual? Focusing too hard on a belief may make parents miss things that are truly important. Children's self-esteem should not be acknowledged through their exam's score or their school achievement, but their selves as human being (self-acceptance). Through the animation project in which our team are working on, I, the storyboard artist has a role to visualize the emotional world of a child who is raised in an extremely authoritative environment. Being a storyboard artist requires the imagination to convey messages and meanings found in a story, so the audiences can understand what lies within the story.
