

ABSTRACT

Covid 19 is a virus that is feared by many people in the world because it can cause death and of course limit the social interaction of life between humans. There are several indicators of problems during a family-wide pandemic, namely culture shock, changes in social order, challenges of working from home, and obstacles in meeting family needs. These three aspects will bring complicated problems and the danger will threaten the welfare of the family. During the social distancing of the Covid-19 pandemic, the communication pattern of single mothers and children is getting lower due to protracted stress, family economic problems and other problems that arise in the family. As a result of these problems that are not resolved, it can lead to the breakdown of communication between single mothers and their children. Conflicts that occur between single mothers and children, starting from poor communication with high notes, and blaming each other between family members. Researchers will use the constructivism paradigm in a real and scientifically proven way to see the phenomenon of society, the positivistic paradigm contributes greatly to the social phenomena that occur. Researchers got the results of the study, that the communication patterns of single mothers in adolescents during the Covid 19 pandemic were self-honesty, harmony, internal family conflicts and conflict resolution.
